

We Are a People of Words

They acquire fast knowledge searching Google as college, and shallow stories they read as if fully guaranteed.

Books are physical and real, but online we might reveal some random information to give an explanation.

If the goal to educate and clearly communicate is for comprehension, why does format cause such tension?

Changing can be right and good even when misunderstood; it allows for creations of new communications.

We are a people of words,
therefore free from any cords that may bind us unchecked to solid objects, correct?
